as the “implementation intention” effect. By writing the exact time block for a lab run, a literature review, or a peer-review meeting, scholars create a mental cue that improves recall and execution. When a researcher sees the day’s tasks side-by-side, it’s easier to rank them by urgency and impact. This eliminates the common pitfall of treating every email as a top-priority item. Over a month, the cumulative effect reduces time spent on low-value activities by an estimated 15-20 percent, according to internal audits of several university labs. Keeping a mental to-do list consumes working memory that could otherwise be applied to analysis or writing. Offloading those items onto a Stubbs calendar frees up cognitive bandwidth, allowing deeper focus during experiments. Many users report fewer “brain fog” moments after a week of consistent calendar entries. Shared Stubbs calendars—whether exported to Google Calendar or kept on a departmental whiteboard—provide teammates with transparent access to each other’s schedules. This transparency curtails redundant meeting requests and streamlines joint data-collection sessions, particularly in multi-site projects.
