When the ceremony date is set, the reception can be scheduled either on the same day (typically from 7 pm to 11 pm) or the following weekend. USC's policy allows receptions at university venues or private locations, provided that the venue is booked at least three months ahead of the event and the total guest count is reported to the student affairs office. March 1-15: Finalize your major and confirm graduation status with the registrar. Begin brainstorming reception themes and locations. March 15-31: Submit your ceremony date request. If accepted, you'll receive an official confirmation and a provisional fee schedule. April 1-15: Lock in your venue for the reception. For venues that require a deposit, arrange payment by April 15 to secure availability. When the semester ends, the real work begins: lining up the date for the USC commencement ceremony and the subsequent celebration with friends and family. With over 11,000 graduates each year, the university's scheduling window is tight, and the coordination of a post-graduation reception can quickly become a logistical puzzle. A clear timeline, open communication with the registrar, and a detailed event checklist are the cornerstones for a smooth, memorable day. USC's commencement calendar is released a full year in advance. The university designates a block of dates in late May to early June for the main ceremonies and a separate window for regional or departmental services. Applicants must submit a formal request by the end of March, and the registrar confirms the slot no later than April 15. If you're aiming for the flagship "Cap & Gown" ceremony, book early—once the 200-slot allotment is filled, there is no room for last-minute changes.
