The university organizes the year into four quarters—Fall, Winter, Spring, and Summer—each lasting approximately ten weeks of instruction followed by a brief break. Key dates include the start of classes (typically in late September for Fall), the “mid-quarter” holidays, and the final exam period. Registration windows open weeks before each quarter, and add/drop periods close after the first week of classes. Knowing these milestones helps students anticipate when to lock in courses, apply for internships, or. When a quarter begins, the first step is to review the upcoming schedule against degree requirements. By mapping required courses onto the calendar, a student can identify “high-load” periods and balance them with electives or lighter terms. For example, placing a demanding capstone in the Spring quarter—when the weather is milder and campus resources are plentiful—can ease the transition to graduation. Early registration also secures seats in popular classes, reducing the need for last-minute petitions. Extracurriculars, research positions, and part-time jobs often follow the academic
