The Nations League, introduced in 2018, replaced friendlies with competitive matches that affect seeding for the Gold Cup and World Cup qualifiers. For the United States, the tournament offers a chance to test depth after a mixed performance in recent friendlies, while Canada views it as an opportunity to cement its resurgence under a new coaching regime. Both federations see the competition as a platform to integrate younger prospects without the pressure of a knockout tournament.

United States – After a 2–1 win over Mexico in the last group stage, the U.S. squad has leaned into a 4–3–3 formation that emphasizes wing play. Coach Gregg Berhalter (or current coach, if changed) has been rotating midfielders to keep the squad fresh, giving minutes to a promising 22-year-old who excels at linking defense to attack.

Canada – Canada’s recent 3–0 victory against Honduras highlighted a shift to a compact 3–5–2, allowing fullbacks to surge forward while a midfield pivot shields the back three. The Canadian side has benefited from the emergence of a versatile forward who can drop deep, creating space for
