into packed routines without missing critical sessions. For many parents, juggling work, therapy appointments, and school activities leaves little room for spontaneous outreach. A unified calendar eliminates the guesswork of hunting down group details on multiple websites or flyers. When the schedule displays recurring meetings—such as quarterly parent workshops, weekly peer—support circles, and monthly sensory—friendly outings—busy caregivers can align them with existing commitments, reducing overlap and travel stress. Assuming all groups meet at the same time. Many support circles run at varied hours—early mornings for working parents, evenings for full—time caregivers, and weekends for families with school—aged children. Check the calendar for time—slot diversity before committing.
