Cleaning, a task often relegated to the weekend or post-work hours, has become a notorious source of stress for many. From overflowing laundry baskets to overflowing dust bunnies, the mess seems to perpetually pile up, evoking feelings of dread and chaos. However, researchers point out that injecting humor and sass into the cleaning process can be a powerful antidote to this sense of overwhelm. Cleaning, at its core, is a mental challenge, rather than a solely physical one. When confronted with the daunting task of cleaning an entire home, it's easy to get caught up in the feeling of being overwhelmed â€” often referred to as 'cleaning paralysis.' This phenomenon can lead to procrastination, which only exacerbates the problem. However, by introducing humor and sass into the equation, researchers suggest that people may be able to break free from this cycle of stress and anxiety. For instance, making cleaning into a fun, upbeat game can increase motivation and productivity. So, how can one inject humor and
