where educators cite burnout and facility decay as primary drivers for collective action. Effective change often starts with targeted, data-driven pilots. For example, allocating dedicated wellness rooms in high-traffic schools can reduce stress-related absenteeism by up to 12 % in the first year. Pairing that with staggered planning periods gives teachers breathing room without cutting instructional time. Investing in upgraded HVAC and lighting not only modernizes the environment but also cuts energy costs, creating a win-win scenario. Superficial fixes: Cosmetic upgrades without addressing underlying staffing ratios can leave morale unchanged. Budget overruns: Pilot programs that lack clear cost controls may trigger resistance from finance officers. Uneven rollout: Applying changes to a handful of schools while others lag can breed resentment and undermine collective buy-in. Monday's vote was not unanimous as board chairwoman Diane Porter had hoped it could have been.
