Crosswords require active recall. Unlike reading a newspaper, which can be a passive intake of information, solving a crossword forces the brain to retrieve words, definitions, and patterns in real time. This exercise strengthens the short-term storage area that often deteriorates first in older adults. While many video games boost reaction speed, they rarely demand the planning and problem-solving that crosswords do. The AARP format includes multi-step clues such as "abbr. for a state that borders Canada" which compel the solver to sequence thoughts, a key component of executive function. Many senior centers host weekly crossword circles, turning an individual task into a collaborative event. The dialogue around ambiguous clues builds verbal fluency and provides a sense of community, a benefit not typically found in solitary sudoku or memory card apps. AARP crosswords are included in the standard membership, avoiding the recurring fees of premium brain-training platforms. For
