adjustments is essential to avoid costly errors and to adopt more efficient compliance practices. Revenue's generation and the gig economy have grown dramatically, prompting the Treasury to reassess how information returns capture non-employee compensation. The goal is to improve tax compliance, close loopholes, and reduce the administrative burden on both the agency and filers. By aligning reporting thresholds with modern payment patterns, the IRS hopes to catch underreported income while giving businesses clearer expectations. Rent and royalties: The 1099-MISC threshold has been adjusted, bringing additional small-scale landlords and royalty recipients into the filing scope. Previously, only businesses filing 250 or more 1099s were required to submit them electronically. The new rule lowers the threshold, so even modest-size firms must now use the IRS FIRE system or an approved third-party service.
